

A Constitutional Democracy is the fourth of Edward Delon's series of books on government and presents a broad analysis of the constitution as well as national security and immigration. The construction of the book meshes well and lends itself as an excellent resource to students, educators, and constitutional enthusiasts. The author, Edward Delon, is a retired Army Sergeant Major specializing in government. Delon's background puts him in a strategic position to gather and assemble key pieces of governmental and constitutional information. The book is well-referenced, making skillful use of first-person sources. The orderliness of the book conforms to an academic curriculum. Delon's emphasis in writing this, as well as his three previous books is to excite readers and motivate them to get engaged in the process.
